officers [illegible] stationed at the seat of the district and appointed by the [illegible] of the Hoops [illegible] of the reserve company [illegible] and Units. (The function of the Hoops has been under Central control in every district to prevent the weakening of the force - especially the Units - in consequence of absence)

Summing up: he was the immediate superior of the forces stationed at the seat of the district and was permanent deputy District Co.

With him an officer (1st lieut. or Captain) worked together, who substituted him in his absence.

District reconnaissance (Intelligence) Branch Co.

Co. of one of the most important branches of the district, usually in the rank of major. He worked quite independently from the District Co. The district Co. did not have the right to look gain insight into the function of this branch being under the commandership of the Intelligence Co. and he was not supposed to give orders with regard to this function. So the district Co. practically did not have command over him. His officers were assigned to him.

His duty was to obtain information through his agents [illegible] about every citizen living in the border-zone (in the depth of 15-20 km. parallel to the border). This concerned the social descent, present political orientation behaviour income employment relations [illegible] with persons abroad [illegible] connections with others by friendship etc. of the citizens. He received daily reports about life in the border zone through his own and battalion agents and he planned and prepared for expected border-events on this basis. If he had concrete data concerning the expected or already attempted border violation he notified the DO (this conversely gave his orders to the
